

There are many good arguments in the public interest against the rule change; there are none for it. Economic benefits to media owners do not constitute an argument in the public interest - and issues of profitability must be considered, at best, secondary to the overwhelming need for an unfettered and diverse news and communications industry. An autocratic manipulation of process to change the rules of ownership is unacceptable either legally or morally, and absolutely inconsistent with democratic principles.